Note their companion from the dramatic photos we just saw walks with the group. The McDonnells are accused of laughing in this scene but it is too grainy to confirm.

Note these photographs of the actual location outside the firehouse. The building in the background is much farther away than it is in the video and still photos we see of the McDonnells and their entourage.

This still is from the same video footage showing the McDonnell entourage. Note the distance from the planter to the pavillion.

QUESTION No. ONE

WHICH IS MORE LIKELY?

1. After arriving at the fire house Chris McDonnell was cold and despite the crowded, chaotic scene and not knowing his child's fate went to his car to get another jacket.
2. The second location was a green screen studio set up for photographs and video. A professional photographer felt the McDonnell's needed a bit more contrast and so added the red jacket.

Let's move on.

Two days after their 7-year-old daughter was murdered the McDonnells called Anderson Cooper to request an interview. Four days after the Sandy Hook tragedy, the McDonnells had a conversation with Mr. “Keeping Them Honest.”

In this interview, Lynn McDonnell described arriving at the funeral home, and seeing her daughter's small white coffin.

'You felt like the floor was falling beneath you,' she said.

Lynn McDonnell went on to describe the family drawing the things she loved – peace signs, ice cream cones, seagulls – on the casket until “there wasn’t even an inch of white.”

Whenever available, caskets of the children were photographed and/or described, so it would be no problem to find this casket mentioned, or certainly photographed.

So let's search for Gracie's casket.

In all of cyberspace I found two articles, and a series of photographs of the McDonnells and others exiting the church following the funeral.

First, I found an article that appeared in several Connecticut publications written by Kurtis Lee, a staff writer for the Denver Post. Curiously I could not find it at the Denver Post.

Grace McDonnell funeral speakers recall spirited girl who's 'in a better place now'

Lee's article describes the 90-minute service, from the rain as it began, to "the singing of Amazing Grace, and around that moment the church lit up as the sun shone brightly" as the service concluded.

There was no mention of a casket. There were no photographs of a casket.

Kurtis Lee is a staff writer for the Denver Post?

How did a reporter from Denver, Colorado come to write an article about a funeral in Connecticut, and RAN in Connecticut papers?

This is NOT one of your questions, though, class.

Still no casket. Let's move on.

We find another article about little Gracie's service. This one is by Susan Tuz, a staff writer for News-Times of Danbury, CT.

NEWTOWN -- A dark blue urn bearing the name "Gracie" in gold script sat Friday in the nave of St. Rose of Lima Roman Catholic Church.

It held the ashes of 7-year-old Grace Audrey McDonnell, one of 20 first-graders killed at Sandy Hook Elementary School a week earlier. White seashells arrayed beside the urn reflected the girl's love of the beach.

Grace's friends and family fought pounding wind and rain to reach the church, which filled slowly. The mourners' mood was respectful and reserved. They had come to celebrate a life that had been cut short.

The service program bore images of wind swept beaches, rolling surf and the young girl with a bucket in hand and a smile in her eyes.

Lynn McDonnell, wearing a black dress, offered a eulogy for her daughter.

"You are not only my daughter, you are my best friend, my soulmate, my teacher of life, love and peace," McDonnell read from the last entry she

QUESTION NO. 2

How does a white casket covered in Sharpie drawings turn into a blue urn?

1. Magic.
2. Creative writing.
3. After covering Gracie's casket with Sharpie drawings the McDonnells changed their minds and decided to cremate their child.

Since the official Sandy Hook story is true, the only correct answer to the previous question is No. 3 – the McDonnells changed their minds, I have one more question.

Question No. 3

If you deface – I mean decorate – a casket with permanent markers, then decide not to use it, what do you do with the casket?
